Meet the Speakers

Iulian Vamanu is an assistant professor at the University of Iowa. His research interests include information needs and uses in academia; arts and crafts, and religion; cultural knowledge and heritage in the digital environment; and ethical challenges related to the use of information technologies. He has recently published on reading habits among recent converts to Christianity and Islam and mediations of Native cultural heritage. Iulian Vamanu is currently working on a study of conceptualizations of heritage in the past twenty years of information sciences research.

Chris Freeland is the Director of the Open Libraries project at the Internet Archive, where he has been partnering with members of the library world to create the online equivalent of a modern public library for users with limited access. He is interested in the ways science and technology intersect in matters of cultural heritage and has published on new media and emerging technologies in libraries and museums. Chris Freeland has an M.S. in Biological Sciences and is currently pursuing an MLIS at the University of Missouri-Columbia.

THANK YOU!
